

Search has changed a lot in the last couple of years. Google and Yandex no longer care as much about exact keywords. They look at the real meaning behind what people type — the intent. This is why many old promo pages stopped working well even if they ranked. Users want clear answers about how to get a bonus, what the rules are, and whether it's worth it.

For 1xBet this means content about the promo code 1XTOWER needs to answer real questions. People search for things like “how to claim welcome bonus”, “best 1xBet code for sports”, or “what are the wagering requirements”. A good article explains the process step by step, shows the current bonus (100% up to €130 on sports or up to €1950 + 150 free spins in the casino), and connects all the important details naturally.

When you use 1XTOWER during registration, the bonus is added after your first deposit. It works for both sports betting and casino, giving new players more room to try different options. The important part is understanding the full picture — minimum deposit, time limits, and what kinds of bets count toward wagering. This kind of complete information is what modern search engines reward because it actually helps the user.

Instead of stuffing the text with the same phrase over and over, it's better to talk about the real experience: how the code works, what you can bet on with the extra money, and how to avoid common mistakes. Search engines see this as valuable content and are more likely to show it when someone is seriously looking for a working promo code.
