

Singapore's substantial expatriate community includes many families from countries with strong classical cello traditions. lvmusicacademy.com cello shop singapore German, French, Korean, Chinese, and British families in particular often arrive in Singapore with children already engaged in serious cello study, and they are looking for a music shop and academy that can support their child's progress to the same standard they were receiving at home. LVL Music Academy's international outlook, reflected in its team of European, Russian, and local teachers and its annual overseas music exchange programme, makes it one of the most appropriate establishments in Singapore for expatriate cello families with high expectations. The academy's teaching quality and Alan's luthier expertise compare favourably with what is available in most European and Asian cities. For expatriate families who arrive in Singapore with a quality cello, Alan's climate assessment service is an important early priority. An instrument that has been in transit or air freight may need adjustment after the change in humidity levels, and early attention to these issues prevents more significant problems from developing.
